Fort Hamilton holds Bio-terrorism training

Story and Photos by Paul Morando

Last week, over 160 people from various city, state, and federal agencies came to Fort Hamilton to participate in a two-day training seminar on bio-terrorism hosted by the U.S. Army Medical Department Center and School.

Army medical experts and instructors from Fort Sam Houston, Texas were on hand to assist civilians on how to respond to a chemical, biological, radiological, and nuclear attacks by conducting lectures and hands-on practical exercises.

The first day of training provided a detailed overview on current domestic and global threats including the 1995 chemical attack in a Tokyo subway system where twelve people died and over a 1,000 were hospitalized. The training also introduced the various nuclear, chemical, and biological devices available.

Through graphic images and slides, the presentation highlighted several nerve agents such as Tabun, Sarin, and Soman; vesicants like mustard gas and Lewisite; industrial chemicals that included Cyanide, Ammonia, and Chlorine and discussed how these agents worked, their use in past wars and conflicts and how they can be properly treated.

On the biological side, where Anthrax has been the main concern recently, the workshop focused on how to diagnose a victim and how to respond to a potential terrorist incident where Anthrax or any other biological weapon is involved.

"There is so much information out there," said police officer, Joe Ranauro from the 68th Precinct in Bay Ridge, Brooklyn after the session ended. "It changed my whole perspective and made me more confident in responding to a possible attack."

A class was also given on certain protective and personal detection equipment that are currently used today in the military and law enforcement departments.

On the second day, Doubrotsky field on Fort Hamilton became a practical training ground for a nuclear fallout exercise where groups were given a real-world situation under the guidance of the "Survive & Thrive" instructor with the U.S. Army Medical Center. The groups had to monitor the degree of radiation that rescue crews would be exposed if a nuclear detonation occurred.

Armed with radiation detection equipment, which for practical purposes were Glotz Positioning System-orientated that are programmed to have a radioisotope fallout pattern on certain points on the field—the students screened the radioactive activity and reported back with their findings.

The overall goal for the architects of the two-day exercise was not simply to make law officials, medical personnel, and leaders of the community aware of bio-terrorism, but to offer a permanent plan of attack in dealing with possible incidents.

"Every body has to figure out the best way to do their business, my job is to offer solutions," said Maj. Joe Gresenz, a chemical officer who demonstrated to the participants at one of the critical ways of patient decontamination and how it can translate over to the civilian world. "What's going to work best for different people is based on a variety of situations that could arise."

According to Maj. Angelo Brevi, commander U.S. Army Health Care Readiness team for New York City, who helped set up the program, this workshop was the Army's first all-inclusive bio-terrorism colloquium for civilians and was the first gathering since September 11th for such a myriad of local agencies and departments to be able to cooperate, coordinate, and share information.

"We actually re-designed the program based off specific requests from participants prior to the training," Woods said, who received such requests from Larchmont Hospital and Montross Medical Center to include a discussion on how to treat patients in a clinical attack.

On the emergency side, City Councilman Murray Goldens, who also came to participate, saw the two-day training as a vital opportunity to integrate his Community Emergency Response Team (CERT) program, allowing them to have a basic, on-the-ground knowledge on how to respond in a bio-terrorist attack. "This training is an ongoing knowledge that is going out to the community to show them that there is something being done to protect them," Goldens said during a break between lectures. "From this we can create a mutual operating procedure in cooperation with the police, fire department, military, medical services, and local officials to let people know that there is a system readily available to help them answer questions or any emergencies that become practice in the community."

According to Goldens, this is the first step to creating a community awareness of bio-terrorist and more training seminars and workshops will be available in the future.

Members of the New York City Police and Fire Departments take part in a practical exercise on Doubrotsky field at Fort Hamilton.

The training program at Fort Hamilton has been held at hospitals all over the city and is primarily geared for medical professionals. Through the guidance of Bay Ridge, we are excited. Larry Morrish and my officials, the training was opened up to cops, firefighters, and anyone interested in fighting bio-terrorists. Ever grateful students from Columbia University were excited with the training.

"The most important part that we found out prior to this training is that we were not prepared to handle a bio-terrorist attack," said Morrish, who worked closely with Woods in getting the training at Fort Hamilton. "Now take a look at the number of agencies who showed up—this can be too. How many universities for bio-terrorist information. Now, we can feel that we have a chance at something."

FORT HAMILTON'S FUTURE VALUE

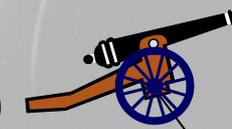

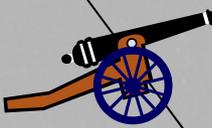

Fort Hamilton's Future Value

New York City is consistently a top terrorist target. Fort Hamilton's location, close to critical infrastructure but far enough away to avoid effects most conceivable potential events, is uniquely suited for prevention, response and response management to a man-made or natural disaster.

1969  After a bomb blast in October 1969, the then "Whitehall Examining and Entrance Station" moved to Fort Hamilton, renamed MEPS.

1993  February 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center in NYC marked the beginning of an ugly new phase of terrorism involving the indiscriminate killing of civilians.

2001  9/11 Terrorist Attacks on the World Trade Center in NYC and the Pentagon in Washington.
